

Ian LE GUILLOU

I have been working in science communications in London for the past six years, since finishing my PhD in biochemistry. In that time, I have mostly worked for medical research charities, where I've used my scientific background to explain to the public the importance of funding more research and to demystify claims of 'breakthroughs' in the media.

I currently work for Prostate Cancer UK, where I am the Editor and manage our website, email newsletters and magazine. I was previously Communications Manager at the charity, where I led our fundraising and media campaigns to promote new research to the public.

I previously worked for Alzheimer's Society, as part of their research communications team, and Understanding Animal Research, where I managed their website that explains the use of animals in medical research.

This summer I will be moving to Paris, which means I will leave my current role and start work as a freelance writer!
